The need for Social Responsibility

An increasing number of organisations are becoming aware of the need to manage the impact of their activities on society and the environment. Their appreciation for the benefits of socially responsible management is leading them to take decisive action and reap the benefits that socially responsible management delivers to their sustainable development.

Escalating demands and increasing pressure are being applied by societal stakeholders, urging organisations to adopt ethical business practices in a systemic and transparent manner. Simply complying to legislative requirements falls short of the greater objective to establish socially responsible management as part of the organisation's fundamental strategy.

Catering to this growing need, ISO established the largest ever work group whose output was the ISO 26000 standard as a guide to assist organisation adopt socially responsible practices. ISO 26000 contains information and recommendations; but it does not contain provisions for determining the minimum requirements for the practical implementation of the social responsibility principles and cannot be certified by organisations that are willing to demonstrate compliance with such principles.

Organisations need models to support them integrating the recommendations, guidelines and principles of ISO 26000 in their daily business. IQNet SR 10 is an international specification which aims to integrate social responsibility management into organisations' business strategy and to communicate the achievements obtained through certification.
